A lawsuit attempting to change how lab test fees can be determined under Medicare recently got the go-ahead from the US Court of Appeals. The suit was filed by trade group the American Clinical Laboratory Association. See what ACLA president Julie Khani said about it here.

The US Department of Health and Human Services' "continued flawed data-collection process poses a direct challenge to the rule of law and PAMA's intent to support a sustainable, market-based laboratory market for millions of seniors. On behalf of those who have already seen the consequences of this painful overreach, we urge the District Court to act quickly to rule on the merits of ACLA's case." – Julie Khani, president, American Clinical Laboratory Association
